Creating a Holistic Career as a Psychologist of Color

Generally, training for psychologists is provided through a Eurocentric lens that allows little space for the exploration of information and experiences outside of this cultural view. Regardless of ethnicity and race, the most crucial factors to sound practice as a psychologist are authenticity, regular self-reflection, and awareness of the experiences that have contributed to how we each show up in this world. In this presentation, we will consider some of the ways in which personal and cultural values can serve as a guide for a career in psychology, and to practice in a way that encourages us to consider all aspects of the human experience.

Dr. Courtney Beasley is a licensed Clinical Psychologist and the founder of Put In Black, a platform designed to help improve Black communities' access to health information. She received her PsyD degree from the joint program between Stanford University and the Pacific Graduate School of Psychology, and completed her pre-doctoral internship at The Center for Multicultural Training in Psychology, at Boston Medical Center, and the Boston University School of Medicine. Throughout her career, she has focused on learning and sharing information that directly affects Black communities across the nation, as well as gaining insight into positively influencing the healthcare and justice systems in the U.S. In her roles of service, she is committed to demystifying the practice of psychology and believes it is most important that she does her part to remind people of their innate power and ability to care for themselves.
